Review Essay

LOCAL PEOPLE’S CONGRESSES AND GOVERNING CHINA

Kevin J. O’Brien

Taken together, these two books depict the role that local People’s Congresses (LPCs) play in Chinese politics. The image that emerges is somewhat unexpected. One might have thought that the crucial question about LPCs centers on how representative they are. What stands out in these accounts, however, is how little attention is devoted to elections, deputy–constituent ties and speaking out at plenary sessions. For Young Nam Cho and Ming Xia, the big story is occurring inside the state, and concerns institutionalization, multi-step deliberation and enhanced oversight. Administrative reforms have transformed the policy process, and new arenas have been created to manage conflict. LPCs have benefited greatly from this re-division of labor and are not a “rival show” or a “rubber stamp” (Xia, p. 228) but partners in governance providing a venue for interested parties (mostly within the bureaucracy) to work out disagreements. Energetic LPCs are first and foremost a sign that where Chinese politics takes place has changed. Legislative development, in this way of thinking, has less to do with responsiveness and changing state–society relations and more to do with state-building, restructuring bureaucratic ties and making Party rule predictable and effective.

If LPCs have become a “strong political force in local politics” (Cho, p. 163) but have been empowered only selectively (with much more attention to lawmaking and oversight than to representation), what does this imply about the shape of the Chinese polity? More simply, what do local People’s Congresses do, what do they not do, and what does their mixture of activism and quiescence say about how governance is changing?

Evidence and Variation

Students of LPCs sometimes fall prey to cherry-picking instances of assertiveness, and downplay the fact that most congresses remain pliant and passive. Cho and Xia do not avoid this trap entirely. Many passages, especially in Xia’s book, detail the most exciting (but perhaps least representative) episodes of contestation, muscularity in lawmaking and vigorous oversight. The significance of events such as vetoing a court work report (the “Shenyang Incident”) or interpellating and then refusing to ratify several bureau directors (the “Guangdong Phenomena”) (Cho, pp. 1-2) can at times be difficult to evaluate, and a feeling lingers that atypical occurrences (and unusually hardworking congresses) have been blown up beyond their import.

That said, both authors have assembled convincing evidence that LPCs are more active than previously thought and that many are closer to the local center of power than the National People’s Congress (NPC) is in Beijing (Cho, p. 163; Xia, p. 250). At a time when the NPC often appears sleepy and handcuffed, the most enterprising local congresses introduce innovations that begin in the provinces and spread outwards. Formerly quiet LPCs emulate dynamic neighbors, and policy diffusion occurs on issues including nationalities’ autonomy, consumer rights and the protection of children (Xia, pp. 163-64; Cho, pp. 15, 165). Provincial congresses, especially, have filled a void created by too few national

---

2 Both authors are aware of this danger. Cho (p. 15) explicitly acknowledges that the congresses which he examines in Shanghai and Guangdong are “pioneers and possible models” and that “we need to be careful about generalizing these cases”.

laws promoting economic liberalization (Xia, p. 5), such that, by the late 1990s, legislators in Shanghai and Shenzhen were heard bragging about how advanced their congresses were compared to the NPC, in terms both of top-notch staff and an ability to enact controversial laws.\(^5\)

Still, legislative activism remains uneven, among and within provinces (Cho, p. 5).\(^6\) In the absence of a nationwide sample (or armies of scholars studying People’s Congresses), Cho offers a number of useful hypotheses about variation and how to understand it. Future researchers will want to confirm (or contest) his suggestion that LPCs are more active in poorer than in richer urban districts and in coastal than in inland provinces, and that leadership, above all, determines whether a congress takes its work seriously (p. 15; Chapter 7).\(^7\) Cho also proposes several typologies that will attract attention: LPCs can be divided into pioneers, bandwagoners and inactives (p. 53), deputies may be thought of as policy-providers, supervisors, reflectors or exemplars,\(^8\) and social background helps predict which role(s) a deputy chooses (Chapter 5). Though this field still awaits large-scale quantitative research, time-series data and in-depth studies of single congresses,\(^9\) Xia and Cho have established a baseline against which change can be measured, while leaving little doubt that many LPCs play an important part in the policy process.

Lawmaking

In the 1980s, laws were typically enacted after a period of gathering experience (Xia, p. 157; Cho, p. 27). Reforms were implemented first through policies, and

---

6. On variation, see also Jean-Pierre Cabestan, “More Power to the People’s Congresses? Parliaments and Parliamentarianism in the People’s Republic of China”, ASIEN 99 (April 2006), p. 43; Oscar Almen, “Authoritarianism Constrained”, pp. 160-61. Xia (pp. 156, 164) questions this, arguing that provincial People’s Congresses “are very homogenous in terms of their institutional arrangements and activism”.

7. Xia (p. 252; pp. 100, 247) also underscores “sophisticated political entrepreneurs” in LPCs and their efforts to strengthen congresses. Oscar Almen, “Authoritarianism Constrained” (p. 154), highlights the role of People’s Congress standing committee chairs in activating LPCs.

9. Xia’s findings rest on a careful reading of Chinese sources, including provincial yearbooks and document collections published by People’s Congresses as well as interviews with deputies and staff members from six provincial-level congresses. Cho consulted similar written materials and also conducted interviews with legislative leaders, staff and government officials in Tianjin, Shanghai and Guangdong. To examine factors that led to uneven legislative development, Cho gathered data on eighteen district and county congresses in Tianjin.
only later “actively but prudently” transformed into law.\textsuperscript{10} In the early 1990s, a new practice emerged. The principle of “lawmaking in advance” encouraged LPCs to step into areas not legislated by the center, rather than waiting for extensive experience and just the right moment (Cho, p. 27). This approach relied on creating test points that preceded national legislation, and using local statutes to launch reforms.\textsuperscript{11} It fostered experimentation in policy areas as different as private business promotion, state-sector restructuring and stock market regulation.\textsuperscript{12} The result was a boom in legislating that put over 8100 local statutes on the books by the mid-2000s.\textsuperscript{13}

Most of these laws concern the economy, in particular market creation and regulation (Xia, Chapter 6). A large majority, as in other countries, were drafted by the government.\textsuperscript{14} Even so, most LPCs have strengthened their capacity to take part in lawmaking. Many provincial congresses now have 100–200 staff members (including dozens of law school graduates), active committees and more standing committee members who serve full-time (Xia, pp. 57-60; Cho, p. 26).

Rather than drafting laws themselves, local legislatures focus on amending legislation drafted by others and on providing a venue for concerned parties to work out differences. This process offers access mainly to government departments, but social organizations (business and consumer associations, the trade union, the Communist Youth League, the Women’s Federation) often win a spot at the table on laws that touch on their interests (Cho, Chapters 2, 6). Since the Guangdong People’s Congress initiated hearings in 1999 and the 2000 Legislation Law affirmed their usefulness, dozens of hearings have also been held, chiefly in big cities, to increase transparency and give selected members of the public a say, however small, in lawmaking (Xia, p. 167; Cho, p. 31).\textsuperscript{15}

\textsuperscript{11} Laura Paler, “China’s Legislation Law and the Making of a More Orderly and Representative Legislative System”, \textit{The China Quarterly}, No. 182 (June 2005), p. 307. Paler notes (p. 306) that, while the 2000 Legislation Law institutionalized “lawmaking in advance”, it also curbed LPC lawmaking in some respects by granting the NPC and State Council exclusive authority in ten areas.

\textsuperscript{14} Eighty-five per cent (34 of 40) in Shanghai in 1998–2002 (Cho, p. 25; also Xia, p. 157). On 80 per cent of local laws in Shandong and “virtually all” in Heilongjiang originating with the government, see Roderick MacFarquhar, “Provincial People’s Congresses”, \textit{The China Quarterly}, No. 155 (September 1998), p. 660. Cho (p. 25) helpfully reminds readers of the “90 per cent rule”: executives worldwide propose 90 per cent of the legislative agenda, and at least 90 per cent of what the government proposes is passed.

\textsuperscript{15} See also Laura Paler, “China’s Legislation Law”, pp. 310-18. Although hearings are mentioned in the procedural rules of each provincial congress, practices vary on whom to
One of Cho’s more striking findings is that the role of territorial Party committees in lawmaking is indirect and limited (pp. 20-22). Prior approval is seldom sought before laws are passed, and the Shanghai congress, for one, only submits its legislative plan and highly sensitive bills (for example, concerning religion or the military) to the Municipal Party Committee. Of course, 60–75 per cent of deputies and virtually all LPC leaders are Party members, so this does not mean the end of Party participation in lawmaking.

On local lawmaking, Cho and Xia paint a picture of a pluralized policy process in which the interests of Party committees and government departments do not have the impact they once had. Multiple players have opportunities for input as a bill shuttles between organizations, and bargaining and clashes occur, but the dominant pattern is one of “active consultation, voluntary cooperation, and intentional pre-emption of conflict” (Xia, p. 174). Outright winners or losers are uncommon (Cho, p. 41), and the job of LPCs is not to compete with the government or Party but to prevent policy from being made unilaterally and to provide an arena for hammering out compromises.

Oversight

Because it rubs up against the Party’s nomenklatura power and leads to friction with officials who wish to avoid disclosure of poor performance or misconduct, oversight is often a tougher assignment than lawmaking. Some deputies have even been detained or assaulted after seeking the removal of a corrupt leader or undertaking a thorough inspection (Xia, p. 138; Cho, p. 93). Nevertheless, LPC supervision of the government, courts and procuracy has been growing steadily since the early 1990s and is now considered a top priority, especially for congresses below the provincial level (Cho, pp. 44, 55, 81).

Deputies conduct oversight alone and in groups. Between plenary sessions, most members join inspection tours that examine the implementation of laws (Cho, pp. 56, 92; Xia, pp. 195-96). These are generally arranged by a congress’s standing committee and can deposit thousands of deputies in the field (every few months) to see if unlawful fees have been halted, pollution controlled, property rights respected and compulsory education enforced (Xia, pp. 190, 197, 205; Cho, p. 56). Reports follow, both to the standing committee and to the targeted department, and suggestions are made, some of which are ignored or have little effect. Although inspections can apply pressure on below-par cadres and warn others to shape up, one 1994 study of Anhui showed that only about 30 per cent of the problems identified were addressed (Cho, p. 57). As they have invite, whether advance approval is required, and how to incorporate suggestions into legislation.

---

for decades, inspections remain better at highlighting shortcomings than at forcing change.\(^{17}\)

Efforts have been made to stiffen oversight by linking inspections with appraisal. Deputies, or more often a congress standing committee, now summon local leaders to explain their work. Five to ten areas are evaluated annually, and in a five-year term LPCs get around to most department heads. Appraisals have become so serious that some officials reportedly tremble with fear at the prospect,\(^{18}\) even though most conclude with a vote of at least “average” or “basically qualified” (rather than a call for dismissal). Still, some officials are awarded low marks for incompetence, unpopularity or misbehavior, all must report on how they acted on recommendations, and a final report is submitted that can figure in transfers and promotions (Xia, pp. 208-12; Cho, pp. 58-62).\(^{19}\)

The power of LPCs to appoint officials may also be considered a form of monitoring. Deputies approve a slate of officials every five years and have the authority to remove those found wanting at plenary sessions or standing committee meetings. In the eyes of some analysts, no more than a “homeopathic degree of choice exists”,\(^{20}\) and it is noteworthy that many of the most stirring stories of defeated nominees for governor or other high office (Xia, Chapter 7) date from the late 1980s and early 1990s. However, reform is underway. Regulations passed in 1995 enlarged the number of participants in screening and gave deputies more choice, so that Party-sponsored nominees do lose and deputy-sponsored ones do get through. A quantitative study by Melanie Manion documents a “strikingly higher” number of cases where the Party lost following the 1995 reforms, though still in the 1–5 per cent range. Only 1 out of every 2000 Party-sponsored provincial nominees was rejected between 2000 and 2003.\(^{21}\) Even if vetoes remain “off-the-equilibrium-path outcomes”, the most important consequence of facing LPC scrutiny may be more careful vetting by personnel departments, so that unqualified or unpopular candidates are not nominated in the first place.\(^{22}\)

\(^{18}\) An Chen, Restructuring Political Power, p. 210; also Xia, pp. 210-11.

\(^{19}\) For details on the appraisal system, and several case studies, see Oscar Almen, “Authoritarianism Constrained”, pp. 130-36.

Some efforts have also been made to examine work reports of the government, court and procurator more diligently. However, despite an upturn in vetoes and close votes (Cho, pp. 54, 73), this form of oversight remains weak. Important reasons include: budget review usually occurs after a fiscal year has begun, extra-budgetary funds are typically not reported, and LPCs lack the expertise to interpret much of the technical material that they receive.

The two authors differ on how conflictual oversight is. Xia detects a pattern of “cautious confrontation” and deference from standing committee members who, as often as not, live in the same compound as the officials whom they supervise (pp. 226, 245). Cho sees more variation by time and target, with congresses soft-pedaling conflict with governments (until very recently) and adopting an aggressive approach to courts (after ignoring them in the 1980s) (pp. 6, 43, 66, 81-82, 164). For Cho, investigating misjudged cases has become a singularly contentious area in which courts struggle to fend off supervision, and legislative activism and judicial independence often clash (Chapter 4).

Strengthened oversight, like lawmaking, is mainly a story of inside-the-bureaucracy reform. It speaks to institutionalization of the polity and a reshuffling of power among state actors. It does not imply the appearance of full-fledged checks and balances or anything approaching democratization. An LPC remains less a parliament than a censorate that polices the bureaucracy and “brings a different but equally loyal perspective to bear upon problems of governance”.

Representation

Representative government requires institutional machinery to allow constituents to express their wishes, and leaders who are responsive unless there are good reasons not to be. In today’s China, the Party still claims to represent the 23 An Chen, Restructuring Political Power, pp. 202-03.

24 Jean-Pierre Cabestan, “More Power”, p. 58; also Cho, p. 52. On the Heilongjiang congress joining with the governor to secure inclusion of extra-budgetary funds in budget reports, see Roderick MacFarquhar, “Provincial People’s Congresses”, p. 662.
26 For this analogy and the quoted text, see Roderick MacFarquhar, “Provincial People’s Congresses”, pp. 666-67. The future of oversight, especially that by standing committees, may hinge on two questions that MacFarquhar (p. 661) suggests: to what extent does a change of job lead to a change of allegiance? Are LPCs institutions where yesterday’s poachers can become today’s gamekeepers?
interests of the people and the linkage between popular preferences, deputy behavior and policy-making is tenuous at best. Local leaders retain a tight grip on LPC elections and there is “minimal electoral connection between the elected and those who elect them” (Xia, p. 101). Some deputies in higher-level congresses do not even learn that they are candidates for office until they read about their “election” in the newspaper. Many members regard selection as a favor that should be repaid by agreeability rather than by the spirited advocacy of constituent interests.

Although representation remains the least-developed role of LPCs, deputies do more “opinion reflecting” than they did in the past (Cho, pp. 4-5, Chapter 5). More members speak up for groups or localities (Cho, p. 101), and some try to nudge policy in a desired direction. An influx of younger, better-educated deputies has energized congresses (Xia, pp. 145-49, 244), and many LPCs have evolved into gatherings of the local élite, including outspoken intellectuals and entrepreneurs angling to win government support. For all that, plenary sessions have remained brief, stage-managed affairs whose length and frequency declined from the 1980s to the 1990s, and there is no shortage of “two hands deputies” who only applaud and vote yes, and are little more than sounding boards (Xia, pp. 43-50, 65, 135).

The best claim for improved representation lies with members who take it on themselves to do “good things” between sessions. What political scientists call service responsiveness—obtaining benefits for particular constituents—has increased since the 1980s. Many deputies now spend a fair amount of time responding to letters and visits, doing casework and acting as ombudsmen. This draws them into all sorts of parochial matters, such as raising funds for a poor student, finding a job for a laid-off worker, helping an entrepreneur resist a tax shakedown, springing a constituent’s son from labor reform or resolving a dispute between neighbors. Of late, many congresses have set up hotlines and reception days, and some deputies hold regular meetings with constituents to listen to their opinions. Through these channels, personal complaints are aired and so are broader, community-wide concerns. Deputies learn of and convey demands to repair roads and bridges, improve public lavatories, halt a hotel construction next to a hazardous materials warehouse, improve restaurant hygiene, relocate bus stops to reduce traffic congestion and so on. Some deputies also go beyond the needs of a geographic constituency to express the views of occupational, gender or ethnic groups. A schoolteacher pays attention to building libraries and science exhibition halls, a religious leader seeks to expel army regiments from temples occupied during the Cultural Revolution, a forester tries to improve education in remote logging camps, a woman looks into day-care availability, a Moslem works to increase non-pork meat supply (Cho, pp. 95-97; Xia, pp. 136-48). Deputies exploit weak electoral ties to address whatever problems draw their interest.

None of these efforts should be exaggerated, however. Representation depends on civic-minded deputies who assume this responsibility despite there being few rewards for doing so and few sanctions for ignoring it. There are also risks (Xia, pp. 137-48). Members who zealously pursue constituent or group concerns can be accused of neglecting the interests of the whole, divisiveness or strong-arming officials. Rank-and-file deputies, by and large, continue to represent the Party as much as their constituents and “are more concerned with the survival of the whole regime and the interest of the ruling elite than the people’s interest” (Xia, p. 251). This is even more so for legislative leaders: following the 2003 elections, 23 of 31 provincial congresses were headed by a provincial Party secretary (Xia, pp. 113, 119-23). Deputies are loyalists who uncover social discontent and sound an alarm before an explosion occurs (Cho, p. 95). Without institutional mechanisms to ensure it, representation rests on public-spirited members and leadership forbearance and, in a fundamentally unrepresentative system, is precarious, inexact and occasional.

33 Some of these examples of constituency service and group representation are from Kevin J. O’Brien, “Agents and Remonstrators”, pp. 369-71, 377.

Looking Forward

Despite their attention to LPC restraint and consensus-seeking (Xia, pp. 172-74, 251; Cho, pp. 45-50), Cho and Xia agree that conflict with other state organs is on the rise. For Cho, growing assertiveness, especially toward local governments, signals a “new developmental stage”, following a productive period of harmonious relations with other organizations (pp. 62-63). For Xia, LPCs have tangled with bureaucratic rivals since the beginning of the reform era while skillfully finessing an either–or choice between contestation and cooperation (pp. 67, 73, 100, 218-20). Both authors see LPCs routinely seeking support from Party committees and the NPC, not least because congresses need powerful backers when they stand up to government departments or courts (Cho, pp. 45-48, 164; Xia, pp. 173, 244-45). The “sophisticated development strategy” (Cho, p. 6) fashioned by congress leaders involves a mixture of cooperation and confrontation, deference and feistiness. It hinges on astute selection of targets, picking one’s battles, focusing on hot-button issues and playing competitors off against each other.

The issue here is not just legislative development but also the role of LPCs in political and (possible) regime change. Xia, plunging bravely into prediction, envisions “the inevitable coming of an authentic democracy to China”, as the Party “go[es] along with the tide of human progress” and “sooner or later has to allow free elections to produce its people’s congresses” (pp. 13, 262). In his view, congresses may offer a place for negotiations about a democratic transition to occur (p. 256) and so act as a “bridge … leading China from its authoritarian past to its democratic future” (p. 13).

Cho, more cautiously, rates recent legislative development as evidence only of institutionalization of the polity, not a harbinger of democratization (Chapter 8). He argues that congresses will be further upgraded if a democratic transition takes place.

---

34 On the increasing number of Party secretaries who serve as LPC standing committee chairs, see also Jean-Pierre Cabestan, “More Power”, p. 52; Oscar Almen, “Authoritarianism Constrained”, pp. 55-57.

35 See also Melanie Manion, “When Communist Party Candidates Can Lose”.

37 On the NPC possibly being a meeting ground where reformers and moderate critics may negotiate a transition, see Murray Scot Tanner, The Politics of Lawmaking, p. 39; Kevin J. O’Brien, “Hunting for Political Change”, The China Journal, No. 41 (January 1999), p. 168. Cho (pp. 167, 170) notes that legislatures typically participate in the debates about establishing democracy after authoritarian systems collapse, and is skeptical that Chinese People’s Congresses “can play even such a limited role”.
place, but that democratization “generally begins outside legislatures” and legislatures play a small part in it (pp. 169, 172) (Xia also believes that People’s Congresses are unlikely to be the driving force behind democratization, but rather vehicles that assist it and benefit from it [p. 256]). For both Cho and Xia, much more is needed than beefed-up LPCs if China is to democratize, including competitive elections, a multiparty system and well-protected rights (Cho, p. 168, 171; Xia, pp. 250-51). This is certainly true, though the real lesson of these books is that we should forgo “democracy or not” questions and be alert to any number of possibilities, as China finds its way out of state socialism. Today’s leaders do not face a choice between democracy and stagnation, but between different kinds of political reform, some familiar, some less so.

38 See also Jean-Pierre Cabestan, “More Power”, p. 69.
Copyright of China Journal is the property of Contemporary China Centre Research School of Pacific & Asian Studies and its content may not be copied or emailed to multiple sites or posted to a listserv without the copyright holder's express written permission. However, users may print, download, or email articles for individual use.